Long 5-star Review

We just had this really long and great Google review posted today by a new customer from Houston, TX that made the mistake of trying to go directly through the Texas Secretary of State to apostille documents before finally coming to us.

What a phenomenal business.

Most people should expect themselves to struggle through the mire that is American bureaucracy at some point in their lives, and processing paperwork through it is one of those things that deserves its own special place in hell. I tried to authenticate some paperwork I needed for working overseas by myself and drove two hours to the authentications office, only to get turned away with a response they could've given me if they had better correspondence and better information online.

This is why you get a business like Apostille Texas to help you out.

Not only does will this business rapidly deliver on its promise to authenticate your documents, but they offer the best information on authenticating and legalizing paperwork out of any business in the United States. It might be hard to trust a Google review's lofty opinion on that, but trust me, after MONTHS of looking through numerous foreign embassy and consulate sites, other courier services, and numerous government websites, Apostille Texas offers the most accessible and informative information on this terrible, terrible process.

Even if you go through the entire website and you still have questions, they have amazing customer service too. I sent a message to them in the afternoon and not only did they answer my questions, but they recorded a 12 minute video explaining the process for going through my paperwork as well. They held my hand through the entire process, from something as simple as where the notary stamp should go on an affidavit and the complicated process for processing my paperwork. This entire service only cost me about $250, which is a fair price considering the cost it would have taken for me to do it all by myself (I estimate around $150).

The only "downside" (really isn't one) is that they're quite a quirky company, but what can you expect from an Austin-based company?

I typically don't write reviews, but a service like this should not go unnoticed. Such a good company.

P.S. We like to think of our company Apostille Texas as boldly unique and awesome, not quirky. ☐
